weather outing

It's hot out there, people.

The human body performs at its best when it can maintain a core temperature of around 98 degrees Fahrenheit.

Depending on your physical condition, it might not take much more than a brisk walk — never mind a rugged hike — on a day with high temps and high humidity before your body can struggle to shed excess warmth.

And, no, “toughing it out” is not going to make a challenging outdoor activity in hot weather any safer. There are very few physical stressors more challenging to the human body than intense physical activity in hot conditions.

The only way you can safely beat the heat is with our three-step process: preparation, hydration, and nutrition.

Virtual roundtables: What they are; who they're for; how they can help

Scouting roundtables — those monthly discussions hosted at the district or council level by volunteer roundtable commissioners — have been invaluable tools for BSA leaders for decades. Their purpose is to provide both the skills to run a successful BSA unit and also the will to keep up the morale, enthusiasm, inspiration, and vision to serve youth.

During the height of the COVID-19 pandemic, when it became much more difficult for people to meet in person, the BSA introduced virtual roundtables — the same idea, just conducted via internet video conferencing.

Then, a funny thing happened: People liked them, and kept using them, even as most areas returned to in-person local roundtables.

“We discovered that virtual roundtables became an excellent tool for communication and getting people excited about Scouting,” says Angelique Minett, the communications chair of the national Scouts BSA program committee. “The idea is to start conversations about some timely topics.”
